Greenwich's goose chase

Late January 2025
Vol. 184; Issue 2

Birders descend upon town for glimpse

One of the birds pictured on the right is not like the others. Somehow, an ultra-rare Northern European bean goose has joined a flock of Canada geese here in Greenwich – its first appearance ever in the Northeastern USA – and word has gotten out to bird watchers everywhere. Lots of people from outside the region have been traveling here to get a glimpse at the unique visitor.

She who watches: Cemetery's interesting death mask 2-3

EDITION NO. 9327 | EST. 1842 | BACK ISSUES ON JOURNALANDPRESS.COM

She who forever watches over...

Darren Johnson
Journal & Press

I acquired a very loyal dog with a strong protective instinct that can't be curbed — to put it bluntly, he bites — so I try to walk him in places where he can't be distracted.

Or kill anyone.

Not anyone living, anyway, in other words, the Greenwich Cemetery. You know, the one near the McDonald's.

(And, yes, I pick up after him, and make sure he doesn't defile any graves. I use a competing newspaper for poop pickups. I even pick up other litter here and there; McDonald's wrappers, crumpled paper cups and some discarded, losing scratch-off lottery tickets, mostly.)

Walking around, I relate the names on the stones to those in our newspaper archives, which I read pretty religiously.

Entering the cemetery via the gate behind Big Lots, one is soon greeted by this face, 10 feet high on a pillar.

Who is this? More on her in a moment.

You may have seen on our Substack that I recently wrote about, perhaps, the least popular publisher of The Greenwich Journal, HC Page. He left Greenwich at the end of 1874, told the town to “go to hell” in print, and took with him several years of archives, now permanently lost.

According to a subsequent editor of The Journal, Page was a jerk. But he also was a professional journalist who had spent his whole career in the field, even managing newspapers in New York City and the Metro area.

Then the paper was owned for a short period by a likable local without much passion for journalism, DW Mandell, who was better suited at selling insurance. Mandell in short order sold the paper to another credible journalist, Henry Clay (another “HC”) Morhous, who ran the paper from 1876 to his death in 1915.

So let's widen this shot...

The grave far left is Libbie (Knight) Morhous, Henry's first wife, who died just months after their marriage at the age of 20 and a half.

At the top of the column is her death mask. Making a death mask was an old practice dating back to antiquity that no one seems to do anymore. A heartbroken Henry Morhous had one made for her.

He had seen countless deaths in the Civil War, where he had served very admirably, fighting in several battles, listed on the second marker.

Henry had already had a career in country publishing but, working for a paper in Whitehall, answered President Lincoln's call to enlist in 1862 and entered the Union army as a private, working his way up to sergeant. He even wrote a definitive book about his exploits: “Reminiscences of the 123rd Reg. N.Y.S.V.” Find it free online.

Henry was beloved in town, led veterans organizations, and had a nice Upstate newspaper resume, not only serving the now defunct Whitehall Chronicle and Granville Reporter, but also surviving papers The Salem Press and The Saratogian.

After the war, he married Libbie in Whitehall in 1866. Not much is known about her. I tried many different kind of searches, but a 20-year-old person pre-Internet usually didn't leave much of a record.

Along the bottom of Libbie's stone, in fading lettering, it says, “Forget her? Hush the thought!”

The third stone is for Henry, who lists as his main title “Sergeant,” and second wife Lillie (Stickles), who he married in 1872, and who survived him. Her death date wasn't etched into the stone. (This seems to be a common problem in cemeteries — how will the engraver know when a surviving spouse passes?)

I'm not sure how Lillie felt about the loving tribute to Libbie. I don't think my wife would be cool with something like that, but ... different times.

(The fourth stone is for William, a son who predeceased his parents in 1910.)

Greenwich historian Sandy McReynolds helped me with the background on Lib-

The death mask

bie's marker. It apparently has had a bit of its own history.

For a period, the long pillar was displaced. Many times, people got spooked that sometimes the head would be looking north, or south, or east or west. But that was explainable as it was on a simple pin that can serve as a swivel, and cemetery visitors perhaps had some fun with it.

For a while, the grave was in disrepair. At least no one ever damaged, or stole, the death mask.

Whatever the case, all is well now with the monument — dedicated to a flame extinguished way too soon, but a flame that also never went out — and Libbie can rest in peace again, watching wistfully over the rest of the departed.

Forget her? Hush the thought!

Former Wilmarth site may see action in '25

You may recall that what was once the historic Wilmarth Building at 126 Main Street in Greenwich burned down three years ago. Since then, the lot had been sold to local design firm Flatley Read, who since turned the project over to a non-profit that has been maneuvering to get a similar sized building built on the lot as neighboring properties rehab, as well. It will not replicate the Wilmarth Building, because it will be LEED Silver environmentally certified, and planners refer to it as “the 126 Main Project.”

In an interview, which will be published on our Substack (JournalandPress.com), one of the people brokering the project, Drew Alberti, said that the delays have been due to increases in the cost of building. Overall, it now will cost $5.5M and Alberti said that they have 75% of funding in hand and expect the rest by this summer in the form of a grant. It would soon after break ground with a ribbon cutting in 2026.

Happy (Un)Benedict Arnold Day!

Sean Kelleher

Special to Journal & Press

January 14 was as unofficial as Benedict Arnold's place in American hearts. No proclamations, no Hallmark cards—just the lingering question: hero or villain? Born in 1741 in Norwich, Connecticut, Arnold spent half the Revolutionary War as a hero and the other half as America's most infamous backstabber. Spoiler: We're still trying to forgive him.

His "boot" monument

In his glory days, Arnold was a one-man action movie. He helped capture Fort Ticonderoga in 1775, stormed Quebec (both marking 250th anniversaries in 2025), and built a floating "Home Depot" to stall the British on Lake Champlain. At Saratoga, he commanded the American left flank while Greenwich held the right. His brilliance helped win the day, turning Saratoga into America's Turning Point.

Speaking of monuments, Arnold has one—sort of. At Saratoga, a statue honors his wounded leg, while the rest of him gets nothing. It's like being employee of the month but only your elbow gets the plaque.

After switching sides, Arnold's tactical genius didn't disappear. He wreaked havoc on Virginia and Connecticut, burning towns like a 1770s insurance commercial gone wrong. Imagine running into him at your high school reunion: "Hey, remember when I torched your hometown? Good times."

So how should we mark January 14? Start the day in patriot blue, switch to British red for lunch, and end in gray regret. Or just raise a toast to Arnold—then pour it out. It's the only tribute he deserves.

*Sean Kelleher is historian for the Town of Saratoga and vice chairman of the Saratoga 250 Commission. Interested in more Revolutionary history? (also a State Qualifier mark). A day later, at the Ed Cepiel Invite, at Springfield College (MA), Chuhta extended his personal best weight throw mark to 52' 8 ¼", which is the 3rd best sophomore performance in the event in New York State. Chuhta has also provisionally qualified for the Emerging Elite division of the Nike Indoor Nationals, in New York City.

The GCS girls 4x200M relay team of Hannah Alheim, Julia Sgambelluri, Arriyana Derby and Sarah Radovich blazed to a second place time of 1:53.06 and took down the forty-four year-old school record of 1:53.6, held by Rachel Bain, Allison Goodman, Tracy Somma and Nancy Mason. In doing so, the 2025 team has met the standard to compete at the State Qualifier meet.

But the highlights did not end with the 4x200M record. Julia Sgambelluri rocketed to a 3rd place finish of 45.53 seconds in the 300M and added a 15' 7 1/2" State Qualifier long jump. Arriyana Derby raced to second place in the 55M hurdles with a State Qualifier time of 9.38 seconds. Sarah Radovich leaped to a 16' 3" State Qualifier standard in the long jump; the 4x400M relay team of Ava Aierstok, Catherine Johnson, Giulietta Gargano and Cassidy Carpenter finished in 7th place (5:15.56): and in her first weight throw meet, Charlotte Collins placed 4th, with an explosive heave of 29' 9 1/2".

As the indoor track and field heads towards the latter part of the season, there is cause for great optimism.

Washington's birthday breakfast

Journey back to the early American era at Ashlar Lodge #584's special Washington's Birthday Breakfast on Sunday, February 2, 2025, from 7:30 to 10:30 a.m. at the Greenwich Masonic Temple, 2543 NY-40. This unique event combines historical commemoration, colonial cuisine, and a special presentation about Lafayette's historic 1825 tour of New York.

Historian Sean Kelleher, Vice Chairman of the Saratoga 250 Commission and Saratoga Town Historian, will present at 9:30 a.m. on Lafayette's pivotal role in the American Revolution and his special relationship with George Washington. Drawing from five decades of experience as an American Revolution reenactor, Kelleher brings the past to life with compelling insights into this crucial period of American history.

The breakfast's colonial-inspired menu offers a taste of early America. For a suggested donation of $12 for adults and $6 for veterans and children under 12, guests can enjoy:

- Colonial-style waffles with deep pockets, served with "Lafayette's Favorite Apple Cider Syrup"
- Made-to-order farm-fresh eggs from Thomas Poultry Farm
- Ruts Ridge sausage patties
- Extra crispy bacon, dubbed "Washington's Choice"
- Rosemary home fries inspired by early American gardens
- Revolutionary Hot Chocolate Bar with spiced marshmallows and cinnamon sticks

In 1824-25, the Marquis de Lafayette embarked on his farewell tour of America, a triumphant journey that celebrated the nation he helped create. During his tour of New York, communities gathered to honor the last surviving general of the American Revolution. Lafayette's visit represented more than just a celebration - it was a testament to the enduring bonds between France and America, and a reminder of the principles that forged the nation. His tour through New York state drew thousands of admirers and helped crystallize Americans' understanding of their revolutionary heritage.

"Our Washington's Birthday Breakfast not only honors our first president but celebrates the remarkable friendship between Washington and Lafayette that helped shape our nation," said Harry Booth, Master of Ashlar Lodge. "We're especially honored to welcome Sean Kelleher, whose expertise brings this fascinating period of history to life for our community."

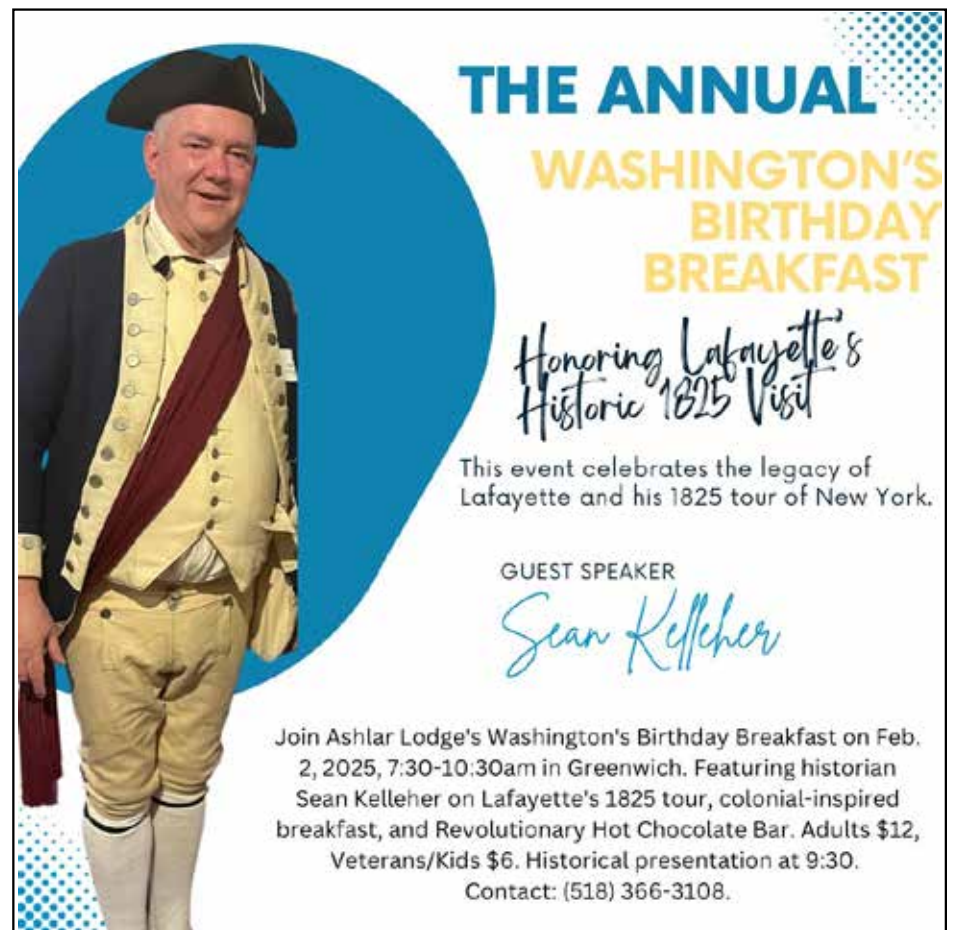

The event includes family-friendly activities, featuring an American Revolution-themed coloring station where children can participate in a contest to win a free family breakfast in 2025. The venue is handicap accessible with ample parking, and take-out options are available for those on the go.

All proceeds from the breakfast support Ashlar Lodge's ongoing charitable projects in the Greenwich community. For updates and additional information, follow Ashlar Lodge on Facebook or contact Brian Nilsen at (518) 366-3108.

Ashlar Lodge #584 continues its tradition of combining community service, historical appreciation, and family entertainment through events that celebrate our shared American heritage.

Mackenzie Spencer: Talkin' About My Generation

Adam Harrison Levy
Journal & Press

Adam: Where are we driving?

Mackenzie Spencer: We're driving on Rt 22 just outside Salem and this is my favorite view. My Dad loved this view with the mountains of Vermont and the silo and the sky.

Adam: Why did it mean so much to him?

Mackenzie: Probably because Salem was the place that he settled down the longest with me and my brother and then my Mom. I see the sunset when I come home from work and it reminds me that I'm going home, it's very symbolic.

Adam: What does home mean to you?

Mackenzie: Home has never been a place for me. It has always been the people that I love. I learned that from a young age because I moved around a lot but I always had the same people around me. Home is more of a feeling. That's a cliché thing to say, but it's true.

Adam: Salem has been your home since you've been...

Mackenzie: Five. I love Salem, but also I've traveled a lot recently, doing photography, enjoying live music, and going out to see concerts and see the world. And part of me is getting pulled from my tiny town to see more.

Adam: Does that put you at odds with your friends? Are you breaking the rules by wanting to get out?

Mackenzie: I learned the rules so that I know how to break them! My friend Sophia, moved away with her partner, Curtis, to Alaska in May, and that was kind of the jump start for me, learning that I also have autonomy in my life. She knew that I would miss her if she left, but she ultimately deecided to go. I learned that I was allowed to make decisions like that for myself. I still talk to her almost every day. We stay connected like nothing changed, it's just that she's not physically here. Our friendship is magical, she's the one person who completely sees and understands me and accepts everything about me, and that's just so important.

Adam: What road are we on now?

Mackenzie: This is Black Creek Road.

Adam: Is this road special to you?

Mackenzie: This is the road that I would drive during the summertime when it was nice out and I wanted to just put miles on my car and listen to music. It was soothing. If ever I'm stressed give me an hour in my car listening to music and I'm good especially when there's wind in my face. I roll my window down all the way and sing songs and drive, just drive.

Adam: What is calming about being in a car and listening to music?

Mackenzie: I like listening to music because it distracts me, it gives me one thing to focus on, versus all of the thoughts in my brain, which are like a staticky sort of noise. I can clock out and just sing a song. I'm a person who, if something happens, wants to completely remove myself from the situation, process it, and then go back to it and handle it,

Adam: So you need your space?

Mackenzie: I like being alone. I like listening to the same song seven times in a row. This is something that my Dad did when I was young. He just enjoyed listening to music in his truck. He would sit in the parking lot of our apartment building, and he would listen to music and I would go out there sometimes and sing with him.

Adam: Is driving a source of inspiration for you?

Mackenzie: A lot of people have their thoughts in the shower. I have my thoughts while I'm driving. I'll have this little notebook, and I'll have a pen next to me. It takes everything in my power not to start driving with my knees while I write my ideas down.

Adam: What was it like to be a kid in Salem?

Mackenzie: I struggled to make friends, and then I lost my Dad, and then there were the catty high school girls. I was figuring myself out so I just kind of floated.

I wasn't honest with myself about the things that I enjoyed because not everyone else enjoyed them. I've never been born to do things in a traditional way. I typically do things the hard way. I've been told that the way my brain works is different.

Adam: So you've learned to do things your way, even if it's the hard way?

Mackenzie: I'm a hyper-independent

Please read more on the next page

person. I would rather do everything myself than ask somebody for help. My Mom is the same way. So I learned from her that I can do anything I need to do myself. I moved my entire apartment by myself - I have muscles! I want to have just what I want. The only way you can do that is to earn money. It's simple. I'm gonna get it now instead of waiting for somebody to hand me money, wait for a birthday like other kids would, or just ask their parents relentlessly.

Adam: When did you find your independence and start working?

Mackenzie: My first job was at Stewarts in 2020 and I was able to support myself through college. I learned to multi-task, scooping ice cream while ringing someone out while at the same time, my neighbor is asking how my day is going and the pizza oven is beeping. I felt my most connected to the town when I worked there because everyone came in, it was a hub.

Adam: Did Salem prepare you for life?

Mackenzie: It depends on how you feel about life and what you want out of life. I'm not gonna lie. I have resentment against this town but also appreciation for it.

Adam: Why resentment?

Mackenzie: It's the lack of opportunity. If you want to try something that is not already here, it's wrong. Nobody seems to be open to suggestions. It feels like if you're trying new things or exploring, this town is very much the "Oh, so you left and went to college, and now you know all this stuff about the world?" It feels like there's a box around

Salem.

Adam: Why appreciation?

Mackenzie: We're definitely on an upswing - the theater is growing and Salem Art Works, they're doing a lot. And we have Jackos and On A Limb, which is phenomenal - Michelle really knows how to make a cinnamon roll!

Adam: So what's the problem?

Mackenzie: I want people to be more open to change because that's all we have and if it doesn't work, then it doesn't work. But where we're at right now is not working for everybody either. If you want this town to continue to flourish, everybody has to be amicable.

Adam: What are some of the pressures on your generation?

Mackenzie: The first thing that my generation dealt with was 9/11. That immediately changed the world. And then we had the housing market issue. And then the wars that we were facing. There was always something life-changing and historical happening to us and then there was the 2020 election and Covid. And nobody wanted to explain anything to us, and we got this generic education. And then we're just thrown into the world and expected to figure it out.

Adam: So you're frustrated?

Mackenzie: I just think that there's desensitization. I've seen the footage of Gaza and they were showing us dead bodies of 9/11 in High School. You want us to care about things, but you're not doing anything to change what's happening. Does that make sense?

Adam: It sounds like what you're saying is that your generation is overwhelmed by all these historical events but you weren't given the tools to process them?

Mackenzie: Right. And then we're blamed for not having a toolbox. But it's like, nobody brought us to Home Depot to show us the toolbox to get through life! So now we're just figuring it out. I think the state of the world is against people of my age right now. And some of us took advantage of the easiness of technology and we learned not to have a work ethic.

Adam: So you think technology is a way for your generation to compensate for these overwhelming historical events?

Mackenzie: It's a way for people to escape their real life. So like, when it comes to dating, you have online dating apps - people are seeking love through their phones! That's just abnormal. That's just odd. We should be devoid of media. I think we should bring physical media back. We're doing this interview for a newspaper. I think newspapers need to come back.

Adam: That's good to hear!

Mackenzie: Ownership has gone down in this generation - we just don't own anything. Everything is a streaming service or a subscription service. Everything is fleeting and not permanent.

Adam: Are you going to stay in Salem?

Mackenzie: Forever? Probably not, I want to get out again for a little while, reassure myself that I'm an adult, can do the things that I think I can do, and then come back.

Adam: You seem a little unusual.

Mackenzie: I've been told. Do I chalk this up to my life experiences, or is this something that I was born with? My Mom would say I was naturally born with it. She used to call me a little Tasmanian devil because I had so much energy she couldn't even keep me down for a hug.

Bill Throop on climate change

As part of Battenkill Conservancy's Annual Meeting and Speaker Series, William (Bill) Throop, Professor Emeritus of Philosophy and Environmental Studies, Green Mountain College, will discuss his new book, "Flourishing in the Age of Climate Change" and relate its lessons to everyday conservation practices for the Battenkill watershed. The talk will take place in the Hedbring Room of the Greenwich Free Library on Sunday, Feb 2nd at 2:00 PM and is open to the public.

As an author, philosopher, and life-long environmentalist, Bill Throop believes that by strengthening skillful habits we can flourish despite the challenges of climate change. For society to approach sustainability, these skills are seen as crucial. Best practices in watershed conservation that focus on collaborative, humility, and frugality skills can enhance our own resilience while helping to restore critical ecosystems. Bill's philosophy offers a hopeful and engaging blueprint where collaboration and education ensures a healthy environment for all. The talk is an opportunity to hear from a passionate educator offering practical advice.

Bill Throop served as Green Mountain College's provost for 12 years and was active nationally in promoting sustainability education, serving on the board of directors of the Association for the Advancement of Sustainability in Higher Education (AASHE) for six years, and as chair for two years. Bill has published widely in professional journals and edited the first book on philosophical issues in ecological restoration. He now spends much of his time working on the family farm in Hebron, NY, where his sheep, chickens and vegetable gardens keep him firmly rooted in the land. He is an avid hiker and cross-country skier, and has been canoeing on the Battenkill for decades.

The history of the Adirondack vacation

The Saratoga County History Center (SCHC) at Brookside Museum announces a virtual presentation by Connor Williams on "Greetings from the Great Camps: The History of the Adirondack Vacation." This will be the 26th presentation in the Center's popular speaker series "Experts Next Door" and will take place at 7pm on Thursday, January 23rd through Zoom.

In 1850, the Adirondack region was a blank spot on the map, largely unorganized and uncharted. But, by 1900, the Adirondacks hosted elaborate summer estates for the wealthiest families in America: Vanderbilts, Rockefellers, Carnegies, Whitneys and Morgans. Thomas Edison and Albert Einstein summered and sailed on the same mountain lake. Adirondacks were a destination. How did this happen, and why?

Join Dr. Connor Williams, scholar, teacher and the historian at Great Camp Sagamore (where he directs their history programming) as he answers these questions, and discusses how environmentalism, opulence, industry, inequality, architecture and nature all intersected to produce the Adirondack Park (and the Adirondack vacations) we still connect to today.

The event is open to the public. It is free for SCHC members, and $5 for non-members. Pre-registration is required through the website www.brooksidemuseum.org.

Buteo and accipiter artifacts

Bob Henke
Journal & Press

I am writing this on the day when, in 1773, the first public museum was opened in Charleston, South Carolina. However, they did not let the “public” through the doors until 1824 after all the folks felt to be most likely to be intellectually stimulated by the collections had been accommodated. This led to great debate and nasty editorials in the newspapers when the Peale Museum opened its doors in 1786 in Philadelphia—to anyone regardless of gender, class, or profession. Of course, there was a dress code—something we should emulate nowadays, in my opinion.

Collecting artifacts seems to have been a characteristic of all human societies. However, when you are a mobile hunter/gatherer unit, it is more difficult to collect items to remind us of people, places, or things. It is thought that the concept of jewelry developed from stringing a talisman on a piece of cord to wear around the neck, wrist, or ankle in order to carry it effectively on the continual treks of the time. Archaeologists despair because often these items are totally perishable—things like claws, strips of hide, odd-colored pelts, and the like, or else they are things that would be unrecognizable as artifacts—a colored rock from a particular location for example.

One usually perishable item, which has been preserved from as far back as Neanderthal times, is feathers. Some were included in both our early museums. Feathers, it turns out, were often included in graves, hence were to a degree protected from weathering and bacteria. Some of these were things like goose and eider down, used to essentially make a soft “feather bed” under the dear departed. Even the tough as nails Vikings, put their warriors to rest in longboat coffins, on deep beds of eider down. And yes, these were often buried, not set fire and floated out to sea like the movies depict. This latter would more often result in bodies washing back to the shore then disappearing forever into the depths.

The intimacy with nature and value placed on certain behaviors has made some of these grave inclusions very valuable in determining the status and social position of the departed. Quite often raptor (hawks and owls) feathers were included. In some societies, the raptors specializing in taking birds on the wing were associated with the warrior class, both male and female. The usually larger, ambush hunters that swoop down on rodents and the like were generally considered more aloof and regal, often chosen to adorn social leaders both before and after death.

This sort of attention to detail and behavior would greatly simplify what is often a mystifying process of identifying the various hawks and owls. I get more identification questions on hawks than any other type of wildlife. I got a typical one in an email last week. It was a rather blurry picture of a hawk saying, “What is this?”

In this area, the first level of identification is size. If it is really big, we have two types of eagles, both look huge, especially when flying and both have a sort of nondescript juvenile phase. Bald eagles with their distinctive stark white head and tail are easy. Golden eagles are a uniform golden brown and sometimes appear even larger than bald eagles in flight. In both species, sexual maturity comes around their fifth year along with their adult coloration. Younger birds of both species are a mottled brown and tan color, the feathers look a bit scruffy, and the bird itself may be somewhat larger than its parents in the first year (because of the excellent nutrition they provide.) The way to tell the difference in the juveniles has to do with their namesake. Our national bird is “bald” because it has no feathers on its lower legs. This facilitates snatching fish out of the water. The golden eagle is feathered all the way to its feet.

There are a few size categories after that so it is helpful to first make a different distinction—the same one the ancient Neanderthals as well as the Vikings as well as indigenous people throughout this hemisphere did. It is a lifestyle difference and is best determined by looking at the bird’s tail. Grave goods as well as costume decorations most often focused on tail feathers for the same reason.

Look at the tail, especially in flight. If the feathers are relatively short and spread in a fan shape, the bird is a buteo. They are typified by relatively straight broad wings, used for the soaring usually associated with the class or just as typically, rapid acceleration down from a hunting perch to nab a hapless rodent scuttling in the grass. If you see a large buteo, and can tell nothing else about it, guess it is a redtail hawk. You will be right in nearly 90% of the cases anywhere in North America and much of South America. In the Washington County area, during the winter months, you may occasionally be looking at a rough-legged hawk. They are similar in size to the redtail but lack the vivid mahogany tail color of the redtail. Mistaking it for a juvenile redtail would be possible as they do not develop the tail color until they are over a year old but there is another good marker. Like the golden eagle, rough-legged hawks are feathered all the way down their shanks to the feet. Redtails are not.

An interesting fact about rough-legged hawks is that, during their breeding season in the arctic, their preferred food is lemmings; they may capture as many as a dozen a day to feed their broods. They are so successful because they can see the fresh lemming urine, which is visible only in the ultraviolet spectrum. Like many other mice and rats, lemmings continuously dribble urine as they travel their trails, not only to mark territory but to help them find their way back to their burrow after foraging. The hawk has only to follow the fresh trail to find the obliviously dribbling little rodent.

The next size buteo is much smaller and does not have a distinctive red tail. More of a woodland bird, it is descriptively called the broad-winged hawk. They are very common but far less frequently seen as the field hunters.

The other type of tail pattern you may find on your hawk is very long, straight, and rectangular-looking. The function of this sort of tail is to be an exceptionally powerful rudder. This sort of hawk is called an accipiter. These are the fighter pilots of the hawk world making a living based on their maneuverability.

There are some larger accipiters. We may see goshawks and marsh hawks, but the ones we are most apt to encounter are the hawks that plague our bird feeders. These medium-sized hawks, roughly pigeon-sized, whose pattern is to pick out a victim and pursue it through whatever twists and evasive maneuvers it may make, ultimately snatching it out of the air in mid-flight. This was the category where the pictured hawk fell.

There are two possible candidates for a mid-sized accipiter with a banded tail, hanging around a birdfeeder in Hampton: the sharp-shinned hawk and the Cooper's hawk. In flight, these birds look identical and, although the sharpie is generally smaller, a female sharp-shinned may be every bit as large as a male Cooper's. Many ornithologists do not even recognize them as separate species. However, if the bird is sitting still, as the Hampton blue jay slayer was, there is a subtle difference. Cooper's have a larger blocky-looking head versus the sharpie's more rounded dome. Even better, however, is that fighter jet tail. Cooper's tails are quite rounded on the end whereas the sharp-shin's tail looks squared off as if chopped with scissors. Either one will make a nuisance of itself at a bird feeder and will stay until the population of songbirds is virtually nil before moving to another area. The best solution is, if you see a bird hawk or the tell-tale piles of feathers, just let the feeders remain empty for a week or so. The lack of a concentrated number of birds will send the hawk looking for greener pastures.

When summer comes, we can talk about a couple other species of little accipiters, one of which was featured in the Peale Museum...

The Mandate

Lance Allen Wang
Journal & Press

The incoming Trump administration's spokespersons have been happily crowing about a "mandate" they've received from the American people to pursue their agenda. Far be it from me to rain on anyone's parade, but there is a problem – there is no definition of what a political mandate entails in this country, except in the broadest possible sense.

The American Presidency Project at UC Santa Barbara defines two very ambiguous terms that we hear thrown about in the aftermath of an election:

"A common view is that a president's 'popular mandate,' as measured by the size of his margins of victory in the popular and electoral vote, predicts the likelihood of him launching enduring changes in policy and politics... 'Landslide' elections are typically marked by very large popular vote majorities as well as complete, or near-complete, victory in all states."

By the standard of the Presidency Project, the new administration does not have a mandate nor did they achieve a landslide, although they have an undeniable victory. As victories go, this was a less than average one.

According to the Council on Foreign Relations, Trump's 1.5 percent margin of victory over Harris was "the fifth smallest of the thirty-two presidential races held since 1900." So as with any of his hyperbole, we should take Trump's claims of "a political victory that our country has never seen before, nothing like this..." with all due grains of salt.

We saw during last month's budget negotiations that the new President will have his hands full keeping a still clearly factionalized GOP on point.

But we can all pretty safely say that the claims of a mandate were written long before the election took place. Steve Bannon, sometimes known as "Trump's Brain,"

(and who briefly wore the moniker "Sloppy Steve" when he was on the very public outs with his boss in 2018), was the same man who urged Trump to simply claim victory in 2020 regardless of the vote count – and the then-President did. Now out of prison after serving a sentence for contempt of Congress, Bannon is continuing to provide advice to the incoming President.

However, Bannon also has been continuing to whip up the base as well. With his recycled John Birch Society talking points that are a staple of the far-right, he continues to promote a no-compromise approach to politics, which ironically is the opposite of conservatism's founding philosophical premise that compromises are necessary as disagreements among competing factions are inevitable.

At the recent event called "AmericaFest" sponsored by the Christian nationalist-leaning political organization Turning Point USA, Bannon was telling attendees that the far right needs to go beyond partisanship - "We need hyper-partisanship now!" he railed. In case listeners weren't getting the point, he made clear that "The political class is infected with a malignant cancer. That cancer is bipartisanship, right?"

At the event, Mr. Bannon attempted to whip up the crowd against Mike Johnson becoming House Speaker. He was very upset that Johnson compromised and negotiated to get the budget passed before a government shutdown.

"It's not just the Democrats that are our foes," complained Donald Trump Jr. to the crowd, "It's a vast majority of the Republicans." He was upset because 38 Republicans voted against a government spending bill that his father was backing.

Steve Bannon being taken into custody

In the end, Mr. Bannon went 0-for-2 – the budget bill passed, and Mike Johnson starts the year as a re-elected Speaker of the House. But don't think for a minute that this leaves Bannon down and out. He still has the President's ear, he is still a popular internet-based influencer for the far-right, and like Mr. Trump, he came back from the political dead – in Bannon's case with an orange jumpsuit to show for his troubles.

What does it all mean? It means that the Republicans are going to be challenged to do anything with their House and Senate majorities unless the one-way street of loyalty to Trump is widened for two-way traffic. The majorities in both cases are slim – again, the landslide was a misdiagnosis. Trump may not get blind obedience from more than the usual suspects. Instead, he will need to wield political carrots and sticks and find a way to help Republicans who are not from dark red districts. The first time around, he was not given to finesse or compromise, despite his claims of being a great dealmaker. The biggest deal he needs to make this time around may be with his own party. Because as a lame duck who will eventually be our oldest President, he no longer has the longest stick – the one that says, "You better support me, because I'm going to be here a while."

Sean Rowe kicks off Writers Project

American singer-songwriter, musician and recording artist Sean Rowe will speak at 12:40 p.m. Monday, Feb. 10, in SUNY Adirondack's Visual Arts Gallery as part of the Spring 2025 Writers Project series.

Rowe's sound and emotional conviction demand attention, and were described in NPR's "All Songs Considered" as so powerful, "he can just crush granite with that voice." The Wall Street Journal proclaimed, "Mr. Rowe's ringing baritone is as timeless as his approach, recalling the ecstatic intensity of late-'60s Van Morrison and stark subtlety of late-era Johnny Cash."

Rowe has graced the stage of Mountain Jam, Wilco's Solid Sound Festival, opened for Robert Plant and the Alabama Shakes, and performed at Caffe Lena. His voice reached international audiences when his song "To Leave Something Behind" was featured in the film "The Accountant," starring Ben Affleck and Anna Kendrick.

His latest release, "The Darkness Dressed in Colored Lights," was recorded at The Hive in Wisconsin by Grammy-winning engineer Brian Joseph (Bon Iver). Rowe writes heartfelt songs strongly rooted in singer-songwriter tradition, urging PopMatters.com to say his lyrics "have the poetic storytelling quality you expect from Tom Waits and Leonard Cohen."

An avid naturalist and renowned forager, Rowe often speaks of his fascination with the woods and his connection to the land. He is touring in support of his new album.

SUNY Adirondack's Writers Project series continues with the following events, each held at 12:40 p.m. in the Visual Arts Gallery:

- Monday, Feb. 24: Memoirist, audio book narrator and actor Marni Penning;
- Monday, March 17: Poet David Graham;
- Monday, April 7: Fantasy novelist Philip Chase;
- Monday, April 28: Author and journalist Megan Mayhew-Bergman;
- Wednesday, April 30: SUNY Adirondack Creative Writing majors will read from their works.

ON THE SQUARE

(cont.)

While all of this is going on, Steve Bannon remains the strategic lodestar for the incoming administration. Possibly his most visible influence is in his strategy of "flooding the zone."

In 2018, he told writer Michael Lewis, "The Democrats don't matter. The real opposition is the media. And the way to deal with them is to flood the zone with s**t." Bannon believes in providing the media with a target-rich environment of both true and untrue stories. If there's something you want them to focus on, just make it extra outrageous and they're programmed to chase it. If the enemy is a "watchdog media" then give them more than they can possibly watch. In the meantime – what are they NOT watching?

Nominating someone as patently unqualified as Matt Gaetz for Attorney General was "flooding the zone." That took all of the journalistic oxygen away from other nominations who may have been equally unqualified. Imperial designs on Greenland and Panama right out of the 19th century? That's "flooding the zone." It may be news in its outrageousness, but it's not likely to happen. What else is perhaps a little less outrageous that we're not seeing? Something a little more likely to happen?

Of course, all of this is meaningless in the sense that it is still an "incoming administration." No plan, as the old military adage goes, survives first contact with the enemy, or in this case, reality. The success of the incoming administration may have a lot less to do with the President-elect's desires, and much more to do with the effectiveness of Bannon's strategies and how well the President-elect can negotiate the mid-term elections and strengthen his ability to push through legislation as an aging lame duck.

Amy Godine to visit DAR

Willard's Mountain Chapter Daughters of the American Revolution will host a book talk and signing by Adirondack historian Amy Godine. Godine will discuss her 2023 publication "The Black Woods: Pursuing Racial Justice on the Adirondack Frontier". The event will be held on Saturday, February 15th, 2025, at the Botskill Baptist Church Fellowship Hall, 26 Church Street, Greenwich, NY.

Godine explores the deep Washington County connections to an abolitionist-founded Black farm settlement in the Adirondack Mountains. The book tracks the progress of the Hazzard family, who were farm laborers in Jackson, Cambridge and Greenwich. In the mid 19th-century, they journeyed to the Adirondack wilderness and built lives as subsistence farmers, Union Army volunteers, and advocates for integration and racial justice.

A Q&A with the author and a book signing will follow Godine's talk. Books will be available for purchase. The event is free and open to the public.

Five words for the 2025 economy

Jill Schlesinger

*Tribune Content Agency
Special to Journal & Press*

The year 2025 will be about change, as a new administration enacts policies that will ignite debate and conversations that could be confusing. To prepare, here's a cheat sheet of five terms that you are likely to hear.

1. Tariffs

A tariff is a tax or duty imposed on a particular class of imports or exports. The exporting country does not pay for the tariff; rather the company that imports the good is on the hook for the extra charge.

The importer may choose to absorb the extra cost, reducing its profit, or pass it along to consumers. The concern among economists is that a fresh round of tariffs could reignite the inflation rate, though most agree that we are not likely to see that frightening 9.1 percent post-COVID inflation rate as a result of new tariffs.

Those who favor tariffs see them as a bargaining chip in international negotiations; as a means to beef up tax revenue; and as a way to shield domestic producers from foreign competition.

They also note that there could be special carve-outs for some countries and products that might tamp down the overall impact of tariffs. President-elect Donald Trump pledged that he would slap a 25% tariff on products coming into the U.S. from Mexico and Canada and an additional 10% tariff on Chinese products, though those percentages could change.

2. Immigration

Trump has promised to clamp down on immigration, potentially deporting some portion (perhaps up to 1 million) of the approximately 11 million undocumented population. There will also be an effort to clamp down on border crossings.

The total economic impact of these policies is difficult to gauge, because according to Capital Economics, "undocumented immigration is disinflationary, while deportations would likely be hugely disruptive for those sectors most reliant on undocumented workers, including agriculture, food processing and construction."

3. Taxes

The 2017 Tax Act and Jobs Act (TCJA), which took effect in January 2018, made corporate tax cuts permanent, but tax changes for individuals are set to sunset at the end of 2025.

The Trump Administration will seek to extend most of the provisions of the individual code, including: lower tax rates, a higher standard deduction amount, increased family tax credits, a cap on state and local tax deductions, repeal of the Alternative Minimum Tax, and an expansion of the estate tax exemption.

During the campaign, Trump suggested that there would be additional tax cuts, but there may not be an appetite for further reductions due to the impact on the nation's finances — more on that in the next section.

4 & 5. Deficit/debt ceiling

When Congress debates the extension of the TCJA, there will be an analysis of the impact on the nation's balance sheet — primarily whether the cuts increase the budget deficit.

A federal deficit is the amount of money the government spends (outlays) minus the amount of money it collects from taxes (revenue) each year.

According to the Congressional Budget Office (CBO), in fiscal year 2024, the federal budget deficit totaled $1.8 trillion — an increase of 8% from the shortfall recorded in the previous year. The cumulative amount of money the government has borrowed over time is the national debt, which currently stands at over $36 trillion.

The debt ceiling is the legal limit on the total amount of federal debt the government can accrue. If the debt limit is reached, the government must raise it, suspend it, or risk defaulting on its legal obligation to pay its bills.

Increasing the debt ceiling IS NOT authorizing new spending — it is simply allowing lawmakers the ability to pay for the obligations it has already made.

Enlightened anger management tips

Dr. Daneen Skube

*Tribune Content Agency
Special to Journal & Press*

Q: I've taken anger management classes, and read anger books, and still impulsively say all the wrong things when I get mad. Do you have any tools you teach clients to deal with their anger better?

A: Yes, first you need to separate out your emotions from your behavior. There are many ways to befriend your inner emotions. Then, there's one super tool to make sure your external reaction supports, rather than undermines, your goals.

As Ambrose Bierce (1842-1914), an American writer, humorously observed: "Speak when you are angry and you will make the best speech you will ever regret." Many clients have proudly told me how they told someone off who really deserved a good verbal spanking. I pause, then ask them how this worked out. They pause, and then give me a long list of negative consequences.

So, the question never is does someone deserve to be yelled at? The important question is do you deserve all the fall out, including losing your peace of mind, to do all that raging?

My theory is that when we put our own quality of life first, there's never a good reason to verbally spank others. There's a saying among my corporate consulting colleagues: "Always fear the person who is the calmest in the room." The accurate point is that he or she who is deadly calm is usually going to be the most effective and strategic.

Also, when we have verbal tantrums with others, our blood pressure skyrockets, our hearts race, and lots of cortisol (stress hormones) flood our bodies. Nothing about these internal reactions is good for us physically or emotionally.

Ironically, people who feel less shame about their anger and accept their anger, are way less likely to blow up. Anger, in itself, is just raw energy. Anger, like intense wind, can destroy its surroundings, or it can power wind mills. The wind in itself is not destructive.

When we use our anger to learn problem solving, interpersonal skills, and persistence, anger is our ally. When we blow up at anyone whom we believe is blocking our goals, we just create a disaster zone at work.

In addition, the calmest person in the room has full access to their neocortex (the part of the brain that creates solutions). Ranting people only have access to the midbrain (emotions) and the reptilian brain (survival). When we rant at others, we've only succeeded at becoming hysterical crocodiles and this doesn't lead to workplace success.

If you're mad, I get it, I'm a fan of the emotion. There's much good in my life that was created by first getting mad. However, I've spent 25 years in therapy learning to feel my anger internally and using the energy to create solutions. Yes, it can require impulse control to not blame and rant when I'm frustrated.

I used to consider that when I transition into the next life, I'll complain about how few times I got to experience the satisfaction of yelling. However, I figure any higher power might chuckle and ask, "Yes, but who was the one that got to all those benefits eh Skube? I have to admit this is a fair point.

We can't have our external tantrums, and our effectiveness. We have to choose to worship at the temple of our offended ego, or worship at the temple of our peace of mind and results.

As you stride out into this next year of 2025, I want you to seriously consider making this the year you chose your own high-quality day over giving anyone you're mad at the power to cause you to lose your inner peace.

Your irritation at that person is temporary, and your ability to keep your serenity is permanent!

The last word(s)

Q: Is there one screening perspective I can use to evaluate potential employees? I keep getting people who are poor performers.

A: Yes, hire for passion and people skills because you can teach the rest! Employees who love what they do will outperform individuals who can do the work, but have no enthusiasm for the job.

'Twitchers' descend on region

Bob Henke
Journal & Press

In England, birdwatchers are known as "twitchers." Watching a group of serious birders for a while will explain this moniker. Looking through their powerful scopes or huge camera lenses, then popping up to scrutinize the area with binoculars, panning rapidly from side to side; if one did not know their objective, they might very well be felt to twitch.

I am consistently amazed by the coordination and seriousness of birders. Once, many years ago, I saw a different bird, took its picture, and published it in a column. By the next day, people were arriving by charter plane at the Glens Falls airport and choking roadways with cars from 20 states, some people having driven for 20 or more hours to catch a glimpse of a hawk owl.

A similar situation is taking place in the Fort Miller area of the Hudson River. On Sunday (January 12, 2025,) there were 37 cars parked along the North River Road, bearing license plates from eight different states, and disgorging over 60 people with thousands of dollars worth of optical equipment. All were intent upon seeing a rare goose, hoping to add it to their life list.

The bird in question was a bean goose. A northern bird that prefers the sub-arctic areas of Europe and Asia, it is named for its affinity for harvested bean fields as foraging sites in its native area.

There are two species of bean geese. Both resemble the graylag goose, common throughout Europe. Domestic geese such as the Toulouse variety were developed from the graylag and the bean geese are very similar in appearance. The tundra bean goose and the taiga bean goose are distinguished predominately by beak color. The tundra bean has a dark, heavy-looking beak while the taiga has some orange on the bill.

In 2021, a bean goose was sighted in a small flock of snow geese on Saratoga Lake. It was probably displaced during migration by the unusually strong and south dipping nature of the jet stream that November. My suspicion is this is the same bird, just happily settled in with a flock of snow geese. I talked to a group of birders, advising them where I had seen the bird last. One particularly animated fellow from New Hampshire assured me that he had seen the Saratoga Lake goose and this one was definitely going to be a taiga. I was not sure what to make of that but he was moving his equipment to a better vantage point so I was not able to ask.

I was also surprised to find that, when interviewed, people had reported getting word about the opportunity to tag a new bird for their life list to a certain degree from internet groups but far more often simply via word of mouth. Everyone calls their circle of friends, plans are made to travel, and the congestion on a narrow country road is assured.

I saw the goose on Saturday when I had no camera that would reach across the wide river. On Sunday, when I brought the camera, there was no bean goose to be seen. As I pulled up, there a small flock of snow geese was flying off down river, so I presume it made good its escape. Nevertheless, there was a great sense of camaraderie among the birders lining the riverbank. Those who had seen it, shared pictures, and those who had not made plans to "bag" it later in the afternoon. Several were going to the Washington County Grasslands to look for short-eared owls. One group from Massachusetts were hugely excited when I suggest a time and place to watch a rough-legged hawk soar overhead on its way to roost. None had a rough-leg on their life list and a hawk was every bit as good as a goose. Overall, everyone had a good time and Washington County appreciates the tourism dollars.

Greenwich's wild goose chase

Darren Johnson
Journal & Press

As of press time, I've received various reports of a unique goose in town. It may be an ultra-rare Taiga Bean Goose, but could be an also-rare Tundra Bean Goose.

The consensus so far is it's a Taiga (which have a longer bill, usually with more yellow on it). These come from Northern Europe, and one hasn't been identified in this state, or even anywhere in the Northeastern USA, before.

Birders have descended upon Rock Street Park in Greenwich, where the rare goose is hanging out with common Canada Geese along the Battenkill. (Bean Geese are known to mingle with other types of geese.)

Village clerk Jane Dowling alerted me by phone and said that numerous cars with out-of-state plates were seen parked in the area, with people trying to get this first-ever glimpse at the bird.

I've been asking around. To the right is the best photo I've gotten, from Jeff Nadler (www.jnphoto.net), a professional photographer from Burnt Hills.

I asked him if he was a birder and if he'd ever gotten such a shot before. Jeff replied: "This is a first recorded sighting for New York State and have never birded northern Europe, where it lives. The most notable distinguishing marks are the orange feet and bill and a subtle white line along the side. I am more a bird photographer than birder but it was still exciting to see such a rarity."

I'd first been alerted to the bird earlier in the morning by our "Outdoors Tomorrow" columnist Bob Henke, who wrote this as a sidebar to his usual column that he had submitted by email (he was in the "Tundra" camp, but as of press time now is leaning to the "Taiga" camp, he texted me):

"I would be remiss if I did not report the tundra bean goose, which has been in the Hudson River in Fort Miller. This goose, a native of the arctic areas of Eurasia, is extremely common in its typical habitat and yet quite rare on this hemisphere. One was sighted on Saratoga Lake in 2021, traveling with a group of snow geese. My suspicion is, this is the same bird, just happily setting up house-keeping with the snows."

I'd texted one of the bird watchers, who had blogged about the sighting. Zach Schwartz-Weinstein, a scholar and professor who trekked up here from downstate, is in the Taiga camp. He replied to my questions:

DJ: Why are so many people interested in this bird?

ZSW: The goose is a Taiga Bean-Goose (Anser fabalis) a species native to Scandinavia and the northern areas of Eastern Europe. This is the first record of this species for New York, and the first record for the east coast of the United States. It is probably the same individual that spent part of November and December in Matane, Quebec, which was the first record for Eastern North America. This individual was first sighted in New York at Saratoga State Boat Launch on December 31 by a birder named Karen Randall. It was seen there again two days later, and then went missing for a week, until John McKay rediscovered it at Fort Miller on the 9th. Since then it visited Northumberland and has spent the last 48 hours in Greenwich, moving between the river and cornfields.

Besides the extreme rarity of this species in this hemisphere, it's also notable that it was first seen at the exact same spot that the first New York record of its sister species, the Tundra Bean-Goose, was seen four years ago.

DJ: So is it in fact a Taiga Bean Goose, or a Tundra Bean Goose?

ZSW: The final determination on the ID will be made by the New York State Avian Records Committee (NYSARC). This bird's bill shape and bill color, as well as head and neck shape, all point to Taiga over Tundra (which is also extremely rare in the US.). Compared to the 2021 Tundra Bean-Goose, this bird has a longer bill with much more orange pigmentation on it, and a much weaker "grin patch" on the bill. (Tundra Bean-Geese have shorter, darker bills, with limited orange, and a much more pronounced "grin patch.")

And that's where we are right now.

Keep your distance from this first-of-a-kind visitor to Greenwich. Keep your dogs away from the area. Let the professionals with the big zoom lenses get the photos. We'll post them online as we get them.

Protecting our peace

MaryAnne Brown
Journal & Press

Peace be with you. We may think of this as a greeting during a prayer service or a gentle expression of comfort to others. Rather than making new year's resolutions, many people are choosing a word to focus on throughout 2025. I decided that my word for the year is "peace." In a world increasingly filled with conflict, noise, and division, I thought, "Peace be with you," might be a fitting way to begin the year with you.

Recently, someone said something unpleasant to me, catching me off guard. I never really learned how to fight. So, I usually try to soothe any ruffled feathers by using the conflict resolution skills I developed during my nursing career. Yet when it comes to personal attacks—especially from this one particular individual—I turn to jelly inside. I have even studied a book titled "How to Fight" by Thich Nhat Hanh, a world-renowned Zen teacher. I suppose I could have taken the bait, expressed my anger, and perhaps I might have felt relief by putting them in their place. However, Hanh explains that it is best to pause and take note of our feelings—anger, irritation, or (in my case) nausea. When these feelings emerge, we should pause and focus on breathing in calm and breathing out peace. "Mindful breathing is a wonderful way to fully make peace with yourself." This is a Zen practice that Thich Nhat Hahn has fostered in all students of life.

Back to my "How to Fight" story. This angry individual was ready to pounce—I could tell. But from my study and practice, I promptly took a careful pause and began breathing mindfully. Because this was a very vulnerable time in my life, I intentionally decided to protect my peace. I calmly proposed a solution to the problem, and when the person offered no response, I repeated my solution and offered a pleasant goodbye. Personal and interpersonal peace is essential for our well-being.

There are many common disruptions to our inner peace. Gossip and criticism cause suffering and conflict; social media clashes increase our polarization; unresolved differences, unrealistic expectations or fear can create tension and bitterness. While it is easy to react in ways that perpetuate the unrest, we can grow into ambassadors of peace by how we respond to the disturbance.

The role of faith in peacekeeping is universal. Jesus teaches during the Sermon on the Mount, "Blessed are the peacemakers..." Muslims see peace as central to relationships by greeting others saying "As-Salaam-Alaikum" (Peace be upon you). Buddhists practice mindfulness and detachment from anger as paths to inner peace. Judaism embraces Shalom as wholeness and harmony, both with God and community. Peace as a guiding fundamental begins with one person and radiates outward.

There is a Peace Prayer that is often linked to Francis of Assisi, yet there is no historical evidence that he wrote it, but it is believed the prayer is inspired by his principles. My favorite musical rendition of this Peace Prayer is "Instruments of Peace" on YouTube sung by the Drakensberg Boys Choir of South Africa. Their pure voices urge the listener to be a peacemaker: "where there is hatred, let me bring your love; where there is injury, we will never judge...where there is blindness, we will pray for sight; when there is sadness, we will bear the grief for the millions crying for relief. Rules of pride and prejudice will cease. We will be his instruments of peace."

This Peace Prayer offers us such splendid words to live by! It could become our very own Peace Plan.

Responding peacefully to disturbances in our corner of the world takes a thoughtful approach. Here are some practical strategies:

1. Pause and practice mindfulness to manage emotions.
2. Seek understanding: Ask clarifying questions; don't assume the worst.

3. Be willing to forgive and let go of grudges.
4. Model healthy communication: Use "I" statements and avoid blame.
5. Set boundaries by balancing love with self-respect.

Sacred Scripture speaks of a peace the world cannot give—yet our world desperately needs peace now more than ever. Our spiritual well-being depends on being grounded in peace. Inner peace requires a daily pledge to be understanding, kind, and patient. Peace begins with small, intentional efforts. As St. Mother Teresa reminds us, "Peace begins with a smile." Perhaps we can start with simple acts and trust that each gesture of peace will ripple far beyond what we can see. Peace be with you.

Living without TikTok (mis)information?

Greg Schwem

*Tribune Content Agency
Special to Journal & Press*

While soon-to-be President Trump mulls the continued existence of TikTok in the United States, I am preparing myself for its demise.

The fate of the addictive and, opponents say, invasive video feed app currently rests with the U.S. Supreme Court, which is expected to hear arguments on Jan. 10. TikTok is owned by ByteDance, a Chinese-based organization. The Department of Justice is concerned the Chinese government may be, in effect, spying on the U.S. by accessing TikTok user data. ByteDance lawyers say any ban violates First Amendment free speech rights.

Trump's lawyers say the incoming president has "no position" on the controversy but asked the court for a temporary stay in hopes a "political resolution" can be worked out. I assume Trump will resolve the TikTok dispute after he deports 11 million illegal immigrants, creates a new national health care plan, slashes the price of eggs and solves the Ukraine and Gaza crises. So, on his SECOND day in office.

Meanwhile, I am trying to imagine what my life will be without TikTok. I'm currently tackling Dry January and that's going smoothly enough, but I still find myself craving the occasional glass of pinot noir or a local IPA with a creative name like Bleacher Bums, courtesy of Chicago-based Spiteful Brewing.

I'm not sure I can withstand the temptations of TikTok.

For starters, how will I function without reading about the deaths of celebrities, announced via TikTok, who turn out not to be dead? In 2024 Joe Pesci, Jeff Foxworthy and Bruce Willis all passed away, at least according to my feed. Last I checked, via sources other than TikTok, all are very much alive. TikTok told me Foxworthy, a fellow comedian and one time golf partner, died in a car crash on May 13, 2024. A panicked phone call to another comedian friend unconfirmed that nugget of misinformation.

Then there is the mountain of "something's not right here" videos. These typically flood TikTok following a tragedy, such as the recent carnage on New Year's Eve in New Orleans. With evidence consisting of a grainy video, obtained from a camera mounted to a utility pole, these "sleuths" are convinced they saw SOMETHING that trained law enforcement officers and forensics experts missed. Maybe it's a panicked pedestrian who fled left when everybody else fled right.

"Something's not right here," is inevitably their conclusion. And if something isn't right, the entire tragedy must be a hoax, correct? Hey, if that's what TikTok says.

Will I be able to get through a day without absorbing videos of some random Gen Zer walking down a city street telling me that, under NO circumstances, should I eat at a certain restaurant, live in a particular city, visit a well-known tourist attraction or waste my money seeing "Wicked"?

Why? Because after one not so pleasant experience, these "critics" are convinced they speak for the entire universe.

Finally, who will advise me on issues of investment, diet and exercise regimens? I've spent hours watching TikTokers who call themselves analysts, nutritionists and "wellness coaches" telling me how to get rich and healthy in 30 days or less. All I must do is follow their advice, which first means subscribing to their TikTok feeds. Say one thing about these "experts;" they have awesome multi-tasking capabilities. How else could one dish out expert advice while still finding time to make daily TikTok videos? Using TikTok's new AI features?

Should TikTok cease to exist, I will have no choice but to read about world events via Pulitzer Prize-winning newspapers. I'll have to visit doctors with real medical degrees for health and dietary advice. Or ask a broker who has actually worked on Wall Street for suggestions on where to park my savings. Just the thought of this makes me shudder.

So, let's hope the Supreme Court does the right thing and keeps TikTok around. Because if the judges vote to dismantle it, that can mean only one thing:

Something's not right here.

A fond farewell to Bill Taggart

William “Al” Cormier, Salem Historian
Special to Journal & Press

“Ladies and gentlemen, children of all ages, welcome to the greatest show on Earth!”

On December 24, at about 10 AM at Palm Gardens, Sun City, FL, 94-year-old Bill Taggart passed away. The announcement came to me from Wes Fields, one of Bill’s close friends.

During Bill’s life, he made many friends in his chosen professions, professions exciting and gratifying. In the fall of 1953, as part of his Hiram College curriculum, he attended an American University Washington semester in Washington, DC. It was there that Bill “ran away with the circus” that summer. He was hired to work for the Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus, taking care of show horses and working the ticket booth from 1953 to 1956.

His love for horses began as a child growing up in Clyde, NY. Wes Fields recalls Bill saying that as a boy he would ride his horse to deliver newspapers. Later, as an adult, he moved to Salem with his mother to live with his aunts and, Windsong, his last horse. Windsong was a Morgan horse that would carry him and neighbors throughout the streets of Salem in summer and in winter in his “two wheel jog cart” or his Frank Wright Studebaker Dealer Salem-built sleigh. Bill’s personality and graciousness made easy friendships coated with excitement and the unexpected.

The lure of circus life never left Bill, even though the outdoor big top circus had shut down on July 16, 1956 in Pittsburg due to complaints by animal rights advocates and Teamster Union pickets. It was here, in his assigned “Yellow Wagon,” that Bill sold the very last ticket for the last “under the big top” outdoor circus show. His story is told in “The Last Ticket” in the Bandwagon magazine, No. 1 2023. Ringling Bros. and Barnum and Bailey Circus would now perform indoor shows only. Bill, however, continued to work with Ringling Bros. in the large indoor arenas and then smaller circuses such as Clyde Beatty-Cole Bros. Circus, and Cristiani Circus.

When he graduated from Hiram College, Bill took a teaching job in Savannah, NY near his home in Clyde and then, moving to Salem, he took a job teaching in Granville. It was here his love for honesty and righteous causes surfaced. He got the Granville Lions Club to sponsor Pete Seeger, and the Granville Sentinel newspaper promoted the March 29, 1967 concert. Seeger, despite being black-listed because of his political beliefs, drew a large crowd to the concert that was a rousing success.

In 1968, Bill managed Don McLean as the Hudson River Troubadour, and that summer the Salem Rotary Club sponsored McLean’s concert. Orchestrated by Bill, McLean participated in the July 4 parade and sang in concert on July 5 at the Salem carnival grounds. That fall Bill was asked by Pete Seeger to take a fund-raising job promoting the Hudson River Clearwater Sloop Inc. He helped raise thousands of dollars toward the estimated cost of $100,000 to build the boat, and, with Peter Seeger’s leadership, affected the start of the Hudson River clean-up.

Bill left a legacy of circus life. During his employment with Ringling Bros. he took 8mm films of the circus acts and the performers in and out of the three rings. The film is now in the archives of the Ringling Museum in Sarasota, Florida. His friendship with Chris Berry, VP of the Historical Society and Associate Editor of Bandwagon, led to Bill’s detailed stories of his experiences with the circus being published in Bandwagon, The Journal of the Historical Society. Upon Bill’s death, Circus History Alive! created a “Zoom Big Top” tribute to him, including a recording of VP Chris Berry’s interview with him, made only a couple of weeks before Bill died.

His friends such as Wes Fields, Bill’s Lyndhurst intern, Chris Berry, Pete Seeger, Don McLean, members of the notable Stephen Rockefeller family, and, of course, his Salem and Granville friends, whom he never forgot, gave him continued support. With his pet dog, Bill made annual summer trips to Salem and Granville to renew friendships. Granville Attorney John Winn said, “Bill was an inspiring teacher, who loved folk music.” Former Granville student, Paul Manchester, said, “Bill was the most interesting and inspiring person” he’d ever met.” Jan Coffinger Baxter, current editor of the Salem Press, recalled that when responding to her FaceBook posts, Bill called her “Salem-girl-Jan” and spoke of his abiding love for Salem. Bill’s endearments were genuine and his friendships lasting. We thank him for being a gentleman and for sharing his adventures. His memory will remain with us always.

Benjamin Franklin – saving local lives!

Michael Levy
Journal & Press

If not for a couple of Benjamin Franklins—yes, $100 bills—this newspaper might have lost two readers and a columnist in recent weeks. While $100 doesn't stretch far these days, in two separate instances, local lives were saved by devices priced at roughly that amount.

In the first incident, an electrical fire ignited in a residential home while the husband was working downstairs in the basement, and the wife was asleep in another part of the house. If they had relied on traditional smoke detectors, which only alerts occupants in the immediate vicinity, the family believes the outcome could have been tragic. Fortunately, they had installed interconnected wireless smoke detectors, which ultimately saved their lives.

The installation of a fully operational smoke alarm remains a cornerstone of home fire safety, but interconnected wireless systems go further by integrating advanced technology to enhance protection. Interconnected wireless smoke alarms offer a significant safety advantage by ensuring early detection and comprehensive notification in the event of a fire. Unlike basic smoke alarms that only sound in one location, interconnected systems trigger all alarms in the home simultaneously when smoke or fire is detected. This synchronized response provides crucial warning time, enabling occupants in every part of the house to evacuate promptly. For example, a smoke detector in the basement can immediately alert residents in upstairs bedrooms, bridging the gap left by traditional systems. Each interconnected unit costs roughly twice as much as a traditional unit, yet the total expense for each unit is only about $100.

The second instance hits even closer to home—this one is about me. Recently, I had maintenance work done on an airplane that required the mechanic to remove and reinstall the exhaust system. During a post-maintenance engine run-up a few days later, my carbon monoxide (CO) detector briefly alarmed. On a subsequent flight, the detector went off again, which raised a red flag since this had never happened before the repairs. Suspecting an exhaust leak, I researched online for a detection method, and sure enough, I discovered three separate leaks. Thankfully, they have since been repaired.

A leaking exhaust system in an aircraft can allow CO—a colorless, odorless, and tasteless gas—into the cabin, posing a grave threat. CO binds hemoglobin in the blood more effectively than oxygen, depriving the body of what it needs to function.

Between 1982 and 2020, the National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) attributed thirty-one accidents to CO poisoning, twenty-three of which were fatal, resulting in forty-two deaths and four serious injuries. Only one of those aircraft had a CO detector onboard, and it lacked the active audible or visual alerts now recommended by the NTSB. It was my CO detector, costing a single Benjamin Franklin, that first alerted me to the danger of the leaking exhaust, likely saving my life and keeping me out of a NTSB accident report.

Of note, I have only had my CO detector alarm during flight just once before, while landing at Albany International Airport with a local beekeeper aboard. A strong crosswind had temporarily blown exhaust fumes into a cabin air vent, and the CO alert stopped within seconds.

For the past decade, I have relied on BW Clip CO Single Gas Detectors in airplanes. While this is not a product endorsement, it is what I have trusted for years after extensive initial research into these units. This device is always on and runs continuously for 24 months without requiring calibration, sensor replacement, or battery maintenance. When my current unit expires in a few months, I will be evaluating newer device options to ensure I am using the best technology available.

Next time you have a $100 bill in hand, look at the smirk Benjamin Franklin gives you if you are buying something truly stupid. Instead, purchase interconnected detectors for your home! Buy a CO monitor for situations where carbon monoxide may be present! Trust me, Ben's smirk will change into a smile when you purchase some $100 devices that can and do save lives. How about that for a random thought!

Bettie Lyons, 86

It is with great sadness the family of Bettie Lyons (Kinnin) of Shelly Park, Gansevoort, NY, announce her passing after a prolonged and noble battle with congestive heart failure at the Wesley Community on December 30, 2024.

Bettie was born on January 24, 1938, in Mobile, Alabama to the late Louis J. and Catherine Baker Lyons, and sister to Robert, Mary Lou, Ruth, Joyce, Alvin, Ernest and John. She was a graduate of both Colby Junior College and the University of New Hampshire at Durham with a Degree in Teaching.

Bettie was mother to Robert Kinnin and Kathy Kinnin. Bettie enjoyed teaching English at Greenwich Central School prior to the establishment of the family business, Kinnin's Pharmacy in Cambridge, NY and Hallmark stores Kinco Card and Gifts from 1962-1984. Bettie was an active volunteer in the Cambridge community while she raised her children. One of her favorite memories was in 1976, Bettie Chaired a week-long event celebrating the Bi-Centennial. This included the burial of a time capsule on the grounds of the Cambridge Library and a period-style Gala Dinner Dance attended by over 200 area residents and dignitaries. Another one of her favorite accomplishments as a volunteer was supporting local blood donations and increasing awareness/volume for the "Bloodmobile."

In the mid-1980s Bettie served as a Field Representative to State Assemblymen Neil Kelleher, Bobby D'Andrea and Senator Ronald Stafford. Through her local political work, she became President of the Women's Club of NYS and County Chair, then Vice Chair of the NY State Committee. Bettie worked with civil servants from Governors Rockefeller and Pataki to congressmen, state senators, state chairmen and local committeemen until she retired in 2002. She also served twice as a Delegate to the National Convention. Despite her many accomplishments and accolades, Bettie was always fond to point out that her greatest achievement in life was raising her two children, Robb and Kathy.

Bettie enjoyed many hobbies throughout her life including hunting with her brothers as children, dancing, traveling, researching genealogy, sewing, gardening, volunteering at many local civic organizations and organizing extravagant dinner parties.

Since moving to Shelly Park in 2015, she enjoyed many new hobbies including bird-watching (especially bluebirds, cardinals and hummingbirds) at her many bird feeders. Bettie attended community breakfasts, dinners, "ladies lunches" and participated in exercise classes with her dear friends.

Bettie discovered a hidden talent for painting, and she took up art at Shelly Park. Her works were on display at the community center and now in her friends and families' homes. She truly enjoyed her daily walks through the streets of Shelly Park with her daughter which often included stops to chat with neighbors (and their pets!).

Bettie is survived by son Robb (Carol M.) of Kingston NY and daughter Kathy Kinnin

Scouts stay busy

Things were very busy this Holiday Season for Troop 6027. It started with a Court of Honor where Scouts were recognized for rank advancements and achievements from the summer. Several awards for service were also announced. The following day was the Community Dinner at the Middle Falls Fire House where over 400 people were served a delicious turkey dinner with all the fixings. Scouts helped with food preparations, served visitors, and helped clean up. As part of the dinner, non-perishable food items were collected and donations were taken. The troop then gathered the donations and went shopping for personal items to then donate everything to Comfort Food Pantry.

Over 600 pounds of items were donated to the Food Pantry. The Holiday Season wrapped up with an Eagle Banquet for Seth Boddery. Seth is the latest Scout from Troop 6027 to earn the rank of Eagle. Scouts conducted the ceremony and were there to support Seth on his amazing accomplishment.

The winter looks to be just as busy with plans for camping trips, a snowmobile excursion, work on merit badges and plans for future trips to Washington DC and West Virginia!!!

If you know of anyone who might be interested in joining the Troop and our adventures, they should contact Scoutmaster Jeff Conkey at trop27greenwich@gmail.com.

Native plants

The Greenwich Gardeners will be hosting an informational program on gardening with native plants and how to combat invasive species on Thursday, January 23 at 7:00 at the Greenwich Free Library Community Room.

You've probably heard the buzz in the last few years about how great it is to plant native species. But why? There are so many reasons, from supporting local birds, insects and other animals to erosion control, preserving the unique character of a region, beauty and more.

Greenwich resident, Cal O'Connell has a long connection to garden designing and a love of all types of healthy woods maintenance. He has been working with the Greenwich Gardeners to develop a long-term plan for our parks and is a valuable consultant/volunteer for the Hayes Reservoir Park restoration work. Cal will introduce the benefits of planting native species and some ideas of how to incorporate these into our properties.

Of equal interest is how to identify and deal with some of the invasive species prevalent in our area. We've all seen the proliferation of some of the most aggressive species; bitter-sweet and honeysuckle, to name a few. Cal will help identify some of the invasives in our area and give tips for how to combat them.

This is the first of the Greenwich Gardeners informational presentations. They are planning two more in the next few months, leading up to the 2025 spring and summer efforts to work on village and town parks and planters. If you have volunteered before or would like to learn more about the group, they hope to see you on January 23rd or email greenwichgardeners12834@gmail.com.

Thygesen ouster wrongheaded

To the Editor:

I'm writing in regards to your Early December edition article on the recent Greenwich Town Planning Board action of failing to extend the tenure of Liv Thygesen to that board.

It should be concerning to each resident of the Town of Greenwich in how each of our local governing board are now made up. There are no current alternative point of view voices on any of them; this cannot best serve the residents and particularly the taxpayers. We are told that by candidates for local offices that they will "represent all of the people of our town [village, etc.]" but at every opportunity they seem to do their best to obstruct not just opposition to their designs, but debate where concerns are meaningfully discussed and thought through.

In particular, I would like Supervisor Nolan to remember that he represents ALL the residents of the Town of Greenwich – and surrounding towns as well, since what happens in Greenwich also affects those towns – and not the interests of the Governor and State of New York, who have their own agenda and quite apparently have agent for that agenda in the supervisor.

Lastly, in regards to Ms. Thygesen, I have had many discussions with her, have seen her represent her own and local viewpoints. She is a direct and sometimes blunt communicator – which it appears some people can't handle – but she is always well researched and reasoned and well questions proposals and potential decisions that might be flawed with unseen (and seen) consequences.

For people in the Town of Greenwich, whether you are a Democrat or Republican, you deserve to be represented fully by people who have your best interests at heart and in mind, not by a group that represents only what they want to achieve, whether it's in your best interests or not.

Sincerely,

Roger DeKorp

Greenwich indoor track shines in meet

The Greenwich Central HS indoor track and field team competed at the Utica Challenge and in a day of several striking performances, broke two school records on Jan. 11. Joe Radovich lit up the track, chasing down several runners in the final 100 meters of the 300M race to place second, by 1/100th of a second, in 37.00. Radovich's time erased the 2024 300M school record of 37.32, held by Jayden White. Radovich also met the standard to compete in the State Qualifier meet.

Other stellar, scoring performances (top

8) among the boys include Radovich in the 55M dash (5th, 6.96); Sam Dixson in the 1600M (5th, 4:56); The 4x400M relay team of Sam Dixson, Wyatt Cary, Adam Shumway and Emerson DuBois (7th, 4:24.71); and the 4x800M relay team of Sam Dixson, Eisley DuBois, Ian Laird and Izaiah Reynolds (8th, 11:05.81).
